other. The door handle was covered in patina and some other disgusting stuff, including rust. There were absolutely not pretty. I am sure Mum will say the same when she wakes up.
Dad put the door by the wall, kissed the top of my head and announced happily:

Saying that, very excited and proud of himself, Dad stepped towards the door frame leading to the garden. He took the curtain off and put the door in.

He said being even more surprised than I was. „And they almost don't make a sound!” he added proudly. „And they close!” he said, as he shut the door, with a small click of a spring which was hidden in the door handle.

„The handle works.” I whispered, stunned. „Lucky I really did not think that we'd find something like this, even.”
Just then Mum entered the room.

“Oh my goodness! You did it! First time in hundred and three years we will have a door!”

Dad was as proud as a peacock. Mum approached him, kissed him, checked if the door worked, and then she shut it with a small click.
